DO THE KIDS REALLY KNOW HOW YOU FEEL?

from the American Counseling Association
 Experts will constantly tell you that good communication is a necessary element in any successful relationship. While we generally think of that advice in relation to spouses, friends and co-workers, one of the most important relationships to evaluate for good communication is with our children.

Do your kids really know how you feel about them? Yes, they should assume you care about them, since you provide shelter and food, but are you really communicating your love, care and pride in them on a regular basis?

It's easy to do when our children are small. Babies and toddlers are easy to hug and whisper "I love you" to even when misbehaving. But that constant communication of love often diminishes as our children grow up, and may almost disappear as we face a grumpy teen whose response to most communication efforts is a grunt, eye-roll or that ever popular, "Whatever."

But regardless of a child's age, or attitude, it's important to communicate your positive feelings in a variety of ways. The easiest, and most direct, is simply to say, "I love you" on a regular basis. Even if the response is only, "Yeah, whatever," your children should know your bottom line is that you really love them.

There are other important ways to communicate your feelings for your children. Simply demonstrating that you care about your child's world and its problems will always improve parent and child communication. When your child wants to share, you need to take the time to listen to what he or she is saying. Your job isn't to judge, criticize, or dismiss the problems, but to really listen, to understand and to care about what you're hearing.

It's also vital that you let your children know you're proud of them. When a child puts in extra effort and is truly working hard, that's the time to tell him or her how proud you are of that effort and of what's being accomplished. Learn to praise the effort being expended, not just the final result, and you can help motivate a child to continue to work hard and be proud of their achievements.

Communicating with our children can often be difficult task, especially as they become teenagers, but putting a real, daily effort into communicating to your child the love, caring and pride you have for him or her can only result in a stronger, more positive relationship.

SMOKING CESSATION

Quitting smoking is tough. Scientists, doctors and smokers agree that it takes extraordinary effort to break the addiction to nicotine. Many smokers try to quit multiple times before they're finally able to succeed.

But support and resources can make all the difference.

Shelby Sheets, RN, cardiopulmonary rehab coordinator, Parkview Huntington Hospital, understands the struggle. An ex-smoker herself, she is the facilitator of the Freedom From Smoking® course the hospital launched earlier this year as a wellness service. And she is proud of the three new non-smokers who emerged from the initial course, which ended this month.

"They did great," she says, smiling. "I was so excited when they all showed up for the second session! It was brave, because quitting smoking can be just as difficult as kicking a heroin or cocaine habit. Two of the five people who signed up decided this wasn't the right time for them. But three stayed and did the work, and told me they were glad they did."

In the informal 90-minute meetings, the group members shared their experiences, discussed challenges of the previous week, completed activities in the American Lung Association's workbook, and enjoyed a snack together.

"I encouraged group members to reach out to each other for added support," says Sheets. "There is no easy way out, and no way to dodge the discomfort. You have to go straight through the fire to get to the other side, and that's recovery. I told them, 'You'll be uncomfortable, but you won't be going through it alone; you have the group, and I'm here for you. And what you'll gain is so worth the effort.'"

To help the course graduates stay on track to a healthier life, the hospital's Adult Fitness Center provided a free one-month membership for each person.

"We wanted to reward and encourage them to stay on this new, better path to wellness that they've chosen," says Holly Sale, director, Rehabilitation and Wellness, Parkview Huntington Hospital.

The remaining sessions will take place on Mondays from 6 to 7:30 p.m.
